Innovation: It's Not an Option

By Philipp Harper

It once was possible to think of innovation as a discrete event, the light bulb that was switched on suddenly to illuminate some dark corner of life. Change occurred at a measured pace, with the state of whatever art—science, medicine, business—advancing incrementally.

No longer. Particularly in business—where advances in information technology have created a global marketplace of unceasing, real-time activity—change leapfrogs change, and woe to those who can't keep pace. The business whose innovative light bulb is not burning brightly and burning all the time risks being flattened by savvier, more aggressive competitors.
